Ross Chapin grew up next to Bald Eagle Lake, north of St. Paul, MN. He enrolled at the University of Minnesota's architecture school in 1972, and started his own practice on Whidbey Island, WA, in 1982.

A Life Less Ordinary

With sensibly scaled buildings and community-conscious developments, Ross Chapin Architects provides a refreshing alternative to suburban sprawl. By Lynne Lavelle

When Ross Chapin was growing up, modest but beautiful homes were just the way it was. The first house he lived in was built by his grandparents between 1894 and 1903, on Bald Eagle Lake, north of St. Paul, MN. It was lovingly detailed, with a large wraparound porch, cut-glass windows at the front door and glass-fronted, built-in cabinets filled with family antiques from 1840s Britain. Around the lake, a collection of diverse but complementary houses made a cohesive, vibrant whole.

Besides an instinctual sense of "how things should be," Chapin also inherited an interest in sciences and a flair for art. The product of a long line of engineers on his father's side and artists on his mother's, he credits his parents for his natural inclination for architecture. Compelled by the realities of suburban sprawl, which had become increasingly apparent throughout the 1950s and '60s, Chapin enrolled at the University of Minnesota's architecture school in 1972. "Across America, when freeways came, suburbs just expanded, there was this tsunami of sprawl," he says. "So the places that I loved were taken over by very mundane, mediocre, garage-fronted houses, and I had a very visceral response to that – I realized I had visual opinions."

Chapin's early studies focused on designs for livable communities, a subject that would greatly inform his career. Upon graduation, he spent time in San Francisco, New York City and Amherst, MA, before settling on Whidbey Island, just north of Seattle, WA, in 1982. It was here that Chapin developed a portfolio of well-crafted, sensibly designed homes, built by local craftspeople. And while Whidbey Island may seem an odd base for a new architect, it reflected Chapin's priorities. "I can tell you, if I were pursuing a career it wouldn't be on a remote island," he says. "I was pursuing a life. And here was a small town that seemed like a perfect place."

Whidbey Island's remoteness proved no obstacle, as one of Chapin's designs made the cover of Fine Homebuilding's annual houses issue in the late '80s. From that point on, Chapin continued to build a national presence, with work regularly featured in national magazines and home design books.

Modest Proposals

Press momentum set the stage in the mid '90s for Chapin's work with innovative new ordinances, and "pocket neighborhoods," to stem some of the influences of suburban sprawl. The first was in the small town of Langley, on Whidbey Island, where in a pattern that was being repeated across the country, the needs of singles, couples and small households were not being met by the town's narrow offering of predominantly large, single-family houses.

With the help of co-developer Jim Soules, Chapin devised the Third Street Cottages, a neighborhood comprised of eight cottage homes on four standard single-family lots with detached parking. To foster a sense of community, the homes were arranged around a shared garden, with a commons building and tool shed. "I didn't write the zoning ordinance that allowed this innovative approach, but I had some influence on it," says Chapin. "It offered an incentive to developers – allowing twice the number of homes on a site than typically permitted, with the caveat that those homes were limited to under 1,000 sq.ft., oriented around a shared garden and the parking was shielded from the street."

Seattle had a similar ordinance, but none of its neighborhoods would allow it. Langley, however, was different. "In a town of 1,000 people we were able to pass this ordinance," says Chapin. "We were able to complete the project, and when we put it up for sale it sold out almost immediately. Not only that, but all of a sudden the story was told in the national press and we were getting hundreds of phone calls and contacts from people all over the country."

Confident that they had discovered a national market, Chapin and Soules created another six pocket neighborhoods in a variety of configurations and settings. "We wanted to show how pocket neighborhoods could exist in different environments, some more in the city and with larger houses," says Chapin.

One of the more eclectic is the Umatilla Hill neighborhood, which covers 2½ blocks in Port Townsend, WA, and features a mix of garden-courtyard cottages, and small- and medium-sized houses – some spec and some custom-designed. "We created kind of a hybrid plan – a little courtyard, a cottage courtyard group that had an alley, which then had traditional homes with porches facing the street," says Chapin. "And so this two block area had a combination of traditional single-family homes, along with a pocket neighborhood. We also had a network of sidewalks crossing between the blocks. So the walking pathways for the neighborhood were greatly improved."

Like its predecessors, Port Townsend was incredibly popular, garnering swift sales and national attention. While giving a talk there recently about his new book, Pocket Neighborhoods: Creating Small Scale Communities in a Large Scale World, Chapin packed the library with more than 100 people. "This reflects the interest it has been receiving across the country," he says.

Umatilla Hill's 2½ blocks feature a mix of garden-courtyard cottages, and small- and medium-sized houses, as well as a network of sidewalks crossing between the blocks.

Designed in 2006, the Buck Mountain compound is at an elevation of approximately 1,000 ft. on Orcas Island. Its spruce-sided structures appear to melt into the surrounding trees and are connected by a sloped trail.

Chapin designed Crab Point cottage (above) and the Greenbank House on Whidbey Island. In the tradition of late-1800s buildings on the island, both feature deep-green and white exterior detailing.

Building Blocks

The success of every residential project, be it a pocket neighborhood or a private retreat, is of course dependent on the thoughtful design of each individual element. Chapin's portfolio of new residential construction comprises a range of styles and sizes, but each house has an organic quality, expressed through materials, orientation and modesty.

Chapin designed the Buck Mountain compound in 2006, for a family intent on building a remote gathering place overlooking the surrounding islands and Vancouver Island in the distance. At an elevation of approximately 1,000 ft. on Orcas Island, the spruce-sided structures appear to melt into the surrounding fir and cedar trees. A sloped trail leads from the main house to a small bunkhouse, weaving through trees with outlooks and rock outcroppings. From below, the main house reaches up through the trees, and is weathered to a dusty green.

"The challenge was that the site was a slope, with very little flat ground, and so we managed to create a little shelf for the main house," says Chapin. "The idea was that this family would have a place for immediate family, but would also have enough room for extended friends and family. It is a very wooded area, so the buildings begin to integrate and play with the natural surroundings."

Though cedar shakes are traditional for an island home, the northwest climate necessitated concrete tile, as well as metal-clad windows. "We get so much rain that moss is likely to grow on cedar shakes very quickly," says Chapin. "So while vertical siding can be wood, and the trim can be wood, we chose to use something more durable."

Back on Whidbey Island, the Greenbank House was inspired by a bygone historic landmark – an inn that once stood on the site. It was here, at the turn of the century, that the Mosquito Fleet ferry would dock several times a day, as the principal means of transportation around the island. Following a fire, the inn was replaced with a nondescript cabin, which remained until 2010. "The clients had spent their childhoods on the beach nearby, and so when they purchased the property, they wanted to take inspiration from the inn," says Chapin.

The Greenbank House was inspired by an inn (above) that once stood on the site. It was here that the Mosquito Fleet ferry would dock several times a day, as the principal means of transportation around the island. The inn was destroyed by fire and replaced with a nondescript cabin, which remained until 2010.

Having designed Crab Point Cottage next door, Chapin was already familiar with the traditional architecture of the area. In a nod to Crab Point Cottage's white trim and siding and green windows, Greenbank House features deep-green siding and white trim – combinations that were traditional for late-1800s buildings on the island. However, the new building is far from a copy: "The house is actually quite different – the original inn had a hipped roof – but it evolved from the idea of that form, and from what would be an appropriate building for this site."

As on the old building, a wide porch wraps around the water side of the house. The interior plan focuses on the front room, which has a 14-ft.-high coffered ceiling and divided-lite windows on three sides opening to the views. A full-sized kitchen pulls its weight for extended family gatherings, yet with a lower ceiling and an eating alcove to the side, is intimate enough for two. Farther back in the house is the den/media room and bedrooms, and a loft for grandkids.

Greenbank House features green siding and white trim, and a wide porch that wraps around the water side of the house.

Below: Meydenbauer House in Medina, WA, was relatively unimposing among the multi-million-dollar homes that dot the shore. When the house came under threat from a neighboring development, just 10 ft. to the south, the clients purchased the lot and worked with Chapin on a site plan.

Making History

While creating a new building from scratch may sound like a more creative proposition than a renovation, Chapin is a preservationist at heart. Whether adapting old houses to improve their functionality or reversing insensitive or inappropriate modifications, his renovation work has rescued many houses from irrelevance – or worse, demolition. "A renovation is in many ways more challenging and in some ways more satisfying," he says, "because you take a building that is dysfunctional and oftentimes a hodgepodge, and the transformation can be stunning."

When Chapin began work on Towerhouse on Whidbey Island, the 1920s gabled cabin had been all but destroyed by ill-considered additions from the '50s and '60s. Further, the house was long and narrow (20 ft. by 48 ft.) and did not function for the client's young children. "The owners bought the house in about 1985," says Chapin. "And they ended up just taking off a lot of the funny dormers, and then they came to me."

Chapin adapted the house over the years to grow with the family, beginning with an addition to the west to capture the afternoon sun, and a deck over a little pool with goldfish. In a later round, when the children were teenagers, Chapin enlarged the house with a new second floor that included a master bedroom, writer's room, and finally, its namesake tower. "The tower is on the prow of the house, almost like a ship," says Chapin. "It has a beautiful view of the sound and that was the meditation room. Up on top, there is a little deck – or widow's walk – that can be accessed via a pull-down stair from the bedroom."

Happy outcomes are often less assured, however. As was the case of Meydenbauer House in Medina, WA, before Chapin came onboard. Among the multi-million-dollar homes that dot the shore, the clients had lived in a simple, unimposing house since 1924. But in 1988, following an earlier renovation by Chapin, the house came under threat from a neighboring development, just 10 feet to the south. "Their neighbor had taken down an old house and was in the process of building an 8,000-sq.ft. house with a five-car garage and a swimming pool," says Chapin. "They took every bit of living matter from their site, which was very steep, causing a number of drainage problems."

Faced with the prospect of a large house blocking the natural light to theirs, and a myriad of site problems, the clients had two choices: move, or stop the project. "The made an offer to their neighbors to buy them out," says Chapin. "They looked at moving, but they loved their house. They are right on the water, with wonderful views. Luckily, they had the ability to save it."

After acquiring the site, the clients undid the potentially disastrous foundation work and worked with Chapin to create an earth-sheltered shop, with a parking spot above. A waterfall flows from the upper part of the site down to the lake, past manmade rock work, bringing sound and wildlife back to the site. It remains one of Chapin's biggest success stories. "It is fabulous," says Chapin. "They took inspiration from the surrounding mountains with the rocks, which are essentially painted concrete. Now the site is covered in mossy growth and leaves and looks as if it has never been any different. It is just wonderful." ■

Green can be Gold

The case against recycling windows. By David Martin

This is the message that the preservation community should be sending to period home owners across our nation: The energy crunch has resulted in the loss of valuable windows.

In the early 1900s, when the storm window industry was born, the prime purpose of a wood storm window was to keep people warm in the winter. There was a savings on energy costs in the heating season, but energy was cheap, and the major focus was comfort.

How things have changed. After the Arab oil crisis in the mid 1970s, energy costs skyrocketed, and since almost every home has air conditioning, the energy cost spike is now year-round, with no indication that circumstances will change.

Aluminum storm windows began replacing wood storm windows in the 1930s, and the replacement window industry began its rapid growth in the late 1960s. That growth led to the widespread assumption that the days of the storm window were numbered, and many window companies stopped manufacturing them.

But storm windows are making a strong comeback. There are four major reasons for this resurgence.

First, the major benefits of storm windows still apply, and are now even more valuable:

- Save half of the energy being lost through windows for both heating and air conditioning. Storm windows provide the same energy savings as replacement windows, at about a third of the cost of new windows. For a non-operating window with a storm window that has low-E glass, the U-Value can be as low as 0.40. With a payback of three to six years, the homeowner is paying for the storm windows, whether they have them or not.
- Adding a storm window to a single-glazed opening will reduce outside noise by about 50 percent. Using laminated glass can reduce that noise by up to 80 percent.
- The result is more uniform heating and cooling throughout the home, and the elimination of drafts and cold spots, such as a couch in front of a window.
- Ice or moisture on the inside of windows is dramatically reduced, if not eliminated altogether. Contrary to popular belief, the addition of a quality interior storm window will not result in moisture problems. If an exterior storm window is added, it is not unusual to have some condensation on the inside of the storm window. This is the result of the forced-air furnace pushing moist air into the home through the primary windows.

Right: Special exterior fixed panels in a custom color and glazed with laminated glass for the Governor's Mansion in Raleigh, NC, provide protection, as well as sound and UV reduction.

This is one of three special windows in the Rare Books Room at Dumbarton Oaks in Washington, DC. These unique openings have interior storm windows with tempered bent glass in a custom color.

Second, the use of replacement windows can erode the historic or architectural value of a home. Aluminum, vinyl or inexpensive wood windows are subject to failed insulated glass, or broken balances, and will have to be replaced again in about 15-20 years. These problems are multiplied for larger windows in Victorian or upscale homes.

Third, higher quality and higher-tech storm windows are now available for both exterior and interior applications:

- Low-E glass is a must these days, as it reflects heat back in during the winter and reflects heat back out in the summer.
- Window film on storm windows can provide 99 percent UV reduction, reduced heat gain with tinting and added safety with special security films.
- Laminated glass results in 99 percent UV reduction, 80 percent sound reduction and added security.
- Custom colors are available to match any desired color scheme.
- Custom shapes can match the primary windows and avoid creating new lines in the glass area.
- Larger storm windows that match large existing windows are available, and reduce the necessity for multiple storm-window units.
- Bowed storm windows for turret windows can be made using true bent glass, and can be provided with interchangeable bowed screens.

This outside-removable gothic storm window with "invisible" clips is a feature window at a residence in Providence, RI.

Fourth, the greenest window is the one that is already there. The use of storm windows provides many environmental benefits:

- The energy saved results in reduced energy consumption, and a reduction in the pollutants that are released while generating that energy.
- Eliminates old windows going to landfills.
- Prolongs the life of existing windows, and reduces damage from interior condensation or exterior elements.

So whether someone has a comfortable bungalow, a stunning Victorian, a stately mansion or an historic museum house, the venerable storm window offers many solutions.

The National Trust for Historic Preservation has a special project to "Save the Windows!" in which they encourage owners to repair and restore the existing wood and steel windows in historic structures, and to consider quality storm windows to deal with the realities of energy costs.

An original window that is replaced is gone forever. Keeping historic windows can save money, increase resale value and benefit the environment. ■

A Primer on Paint

By Gordon Bock

Lest you think that exterior paint for historic houses is as steady state and timeless as, say, copper flashing or lime mortar, think again. The product makeovers in architectural coatings that first kicked in for consumers about 15 years ago, with the seismic shift from oil-based to water-based technology, are still going on, and with them come ramifications for not only what you can buy today, but also what we'll all be using tomorrow. Here's a look at a few of the current trends and buzzwords that you should know before heading to the paint-store shelves.

What is Low-VOC Paint?

If you've always assumed that water-based paints are the clean-air solution to the emissions drawbacks of oil-based paints, then you're probably wondering what's behind the new crop of paint cans labeled low-VOC (volatile organic compound). The answer, as put by several experts, is "it's a mixed bag."

"Over the last 10 to 15 years we've seen increases in paint technology – better materials, better pigments, better solvents – and the advancement from high-VOC products to lower VOC products," says Richard Watson of Cleveland, OH-based Sherwin-Williams. "Now we're formulating to try and hit less than 50 grams of VOC per liter."

As Watson explains, the 50-gram mark is both local and national. "The South Coast Air Quality Management District [the smog control agency for Los Angeles and the surrounding counties] requires that flat, non-flat, and high-gloss products have less than 50 grams VOC, so if you want to sell in the Southern California area, you have to produce products that are less than 50 grams."

When it comes to air quality issues, as California goes so goes the country. Jeffrey Spillane at Benjamin Moore & Co. in New Jersey observes, "California has the most stringent regulations, and [in that state] nearly all alkyd products are gone. In the OTC (Ozone Transportation Commission) area, some alkyd products are still available, and much of the Midwest is still able to sell most alkyd-based products." (At the OTC, which develops regional regulations for addressing the ozone problem in the Northeast, VOC levels vary by paint category, but are modeled on those of CARB, the California Air Resources Board.) Nonetheless, says Spillane, "VOC regulation will continue to become more stringent, and traditional alkyd-based products will eventually be no more."

To that point, Watson notes that last year Ohio adopted an OTC-type format, and Indiana recently did the same. According to George Dale at Behr Paints, based in California, "All our paints are pretty low in VOCs, but we have a particular low-VOC line that is specifically designed to have the lowest amount possible.

"The government wants the industry as a whole to produce what they call 'environmentally friendly products,' so it's getting away from a lot of oil-based products."

And in case the term low-VOC doesn't sound mushy enough, John Lahey of Woodstock, VT-based Fine Paints of Europe says, "Until a few years ago paints in the 50 to 100 gram range were the definition of low-VOC." He also points out that the American method of measuring VOC differs from the European method, and that paint with a VOC of 70 that has double the service life of one with a VOC of 50 may actually be better for the environment.

Low VOC vs. No VOC

If the solvents in oil-based paints were swapped for the water in water-based paints, what more

VOCs are left to eliminate? Again, the answer isn't so simple. "Most people understand that VOCs come from solvents evaporating from the paint film," says Watson, "but it's not just solvent; you also have all the other raw materials that may have VOCs." As he explains, paint manufacturers can reduce VOCs through their product's formulation – that is, by the raw materials they choose to add.

"Even raw materials manufacturers are looking at creating raw materials with less and less VOCs," says Watson, "so when those come through the marketplace a paint manufacturer looks at them and asks 'Does this raw material fit into my formulation for creating products that are less than 50 grams?'"

As Watson emphasizes, the industry push is not just for 50 grams, but also below. "LEED programs don't say 50 grams; they give you regulations like 'South Coast 2004,'" he says. "To stay ahead of the curve, in the last couple of years we've come out with very low VOC-type products that are not required by regulation."

Spillane's company is on the same track. "We've patented a 0.0 VOC waterborne tinting system," he says, "that allows paint and decorating retailers to tint many of our waterborne coatings without adding any VOC, while actually improving the performance of the base paint."

What Identifies Good Paint?

Fortunately, when the question is how to choose good quality paint, the advice is unanimous: you get what you pay for. "In general, price is a good barometer," says Spillane. "Higher pigment and resin content are a good start; however, the quality of those ingredients, other additives, and the actual manufacturing process, are what really drive the final results."

Watson agrees. "Among the things we preach are that higher quality ingredients mean better performance – better resistance to chalking and fading, better resistance to blistering and peeling," he says. "It's not necessarily the more pigment the better. There are prime pigments, like titanium dioxide, and then there are extender pigments like clays, talcs and calciums. It's the better pigments that give you better performance."

But is there any way to crunch the numbers? Dale says that Behr products, and most comparable products, have an MSDS (Material Safety Data Sheet) that lists everything in the product that's not proprietary. "Also, you should be able to get the architectural specs for any of the products you're looking at," he says. "At our company, they're downloadable and tell you the solvent content, what the solids are, what materials are included." For example, Dale says

Paint Basics

To better understand how paint works and continues to change, it helps to look at it in terms of three basic components: pigments, binders and solvents.

Pigments give paint color, as well as the opacity that protects the substrate from UV rays. Pigments come from many sources. Historic pigments include natural iron oxides (ochers, siennas), verdigris (corroded brass or copper) as well as early manmade compounds like chrome yellow and Prussian blue. Lead carbonate, the most notorious pigment and long the source of white, is now replaced by titanium dioxide; other modern pigments may also be included as extenders.

Binders (sometimes called vehicles) are the liquids that form a semi-solid film, holding the pigments to the substrate. "Every paint has a binder – something that acts as glue for the pigment," say Roger Carmona of Kremer Pigments. "If you don't have a binder but, say, only add water to the pigment, when the water evaporates, your "paint" just becomes pigment again – powder." Historic binders were natural drying oils, principally linseed oil. By the 1930s many oil binders were being augmented with alkyds (resins derived from soy and other plant-based materials). With the advent of water-based paints in the 1950s, paint manufacturers moved to manmade binders with synthetic resins – the acrylics and other polymers that are essentially plastics.

Solvents are liquids added to the binder/pigment mix in manufacturing to make the paint more brush-able, but that evaporate once the paint is applied. For oil-based paints, turpentine (distilled from pine trees) and petroleum distillates were the traditional solvents – ingredients now closely watched as VOCs (volatile organic compounds). In water-based paints, water is the primary solvent.

that they use a lot of titanium dioxide pigment, where some paints use less expensive minerals, like calcium carbonate.

"I'm in the aesthetics business," says James Martin of The Color People in Denver, CO, and from his perspective, "the real difference is in aesthetics: cheaper paint tends to look tired in three to five years."

"Every house paint maker is likely to add fillers to extend the paint and make it a little less expensive," says Roger Carmona of Kremer Pigments of New York City. "The most pure, richest house paints probably have higher concentrations of pigment, and that makes them more expensive."

What is Waterborne Alkyd?

Solvent-based paints may be going the way of the buffalo, but that doesn't mean that alkyd is disappearing. On the contrary, the resin, derived from plant-based materials, is starting to pop up again on paint can labels and may soon be common again on building exteriors – and not just because it is lower in cost than petroleum-based resins.

"It's a superior coating that has been available from high-end, western European paint producers for some 20 years," says Lahey. "Our Dutch manufacturer had it 33 years ago, and it's now being introduced to the U.S. by American manufacturers strictly for interior use."

Hints on Historic Colors

When it comes to picking historically appropriate colors for pre-1960s houses, two color consultants share some practical insights:

James Martin of The Color People of Denver, CO:
"Historic color schemes of the past tend to be dark by modern tastes." His company's approach is to start with historic colors, and then make them lighter, especially window sash. Porches too tend to "step away from the building, rather than receding in" if painted in lighter colors.

Barbara Jacobs of Barbara Jacobs Color and Design of Medfield, MA:
"Don't be afraid to custom mix your own colors, with the help of your paint dealer, but do try out test panels before proceeding with the whole house, and keep careful records of your final formula, so you can reproduce it in quantity."

"Do your best to coordinate any future window upgrades or storm window installations with your painting campaign. It's a shame to finish a distinctive historical color scheme, then install generic white windows a year or two later, when they could have been ordered in your trim color, or vice versa."

Behr's Silver Sky W-F-510, Deep Space 750F-7 and Awning Red S-H-180 were used to finish this residence.

According to Lahey, the advantage of a waterborne alkyd versus a waterborne acrylic is its color retention and greater ability to expand and contract, thereby avoiding the drying out and cracking that shorten the life of the finish. There's also the smooth, tight, washable finish of an oil-based paint in a water-based product.

"It's a kind of hybrid that provides the homeowner with the best of both worlds," says Lahey.

"One of the products we've created is an acrylic-alkyd, a paint that's going to give you the flow, leveling, you'd expect in an alkyd, but the color and gloss retention of an acrylic," adds Watson. "Our three different lines of acrylic-alkyd modification are meant for interior woodwork – doors, crown moldings and the like – but you could use them for exterior trim, just not the whole house."

What Makes a Good Paint Job?

Quite simply, you can't expect a lasting paint job on a building with surface or moisture problems. "People focus on the paint," says Lahey, "but they don't focus on the substrate, and the method in which the substrate is prepared for paint."

The old axiom that most of the cost of a good paint job is in the preparation still holds true. "With any exterior painting," says Spillane, "preparation is the key to a successful, long-lasting job. Consumers should avoid products that make claims about reducing or eliminating surface preparation." Critical issues to consider include:

- addressing paint failure and moisture problems, such as high interior moisture levels or leaking gutters, that are causing paint to peel down to bare wood, often leaving it noticeably damp.
- choosing high-quality, durable woods for repairs and new construction.
- thoroughly scrubbing – not simply power washing – existing, sound paint surfaces free of dirt and pollution for best adhesion in repainting.

Paint-like products that claim to eliminate the labor of surface preparation with super primers or offer a maintenance-free finish with a hyper-thick coating do not always stand up to time-tested practices or materials. "Typically you want substrates to be able to breathe, and if you're looking at siding, do really want to put a 20-, 30- , or 40-mil. thick coating on wood?" says Watson.

"People who beat themselves up over saving or spending a couple of dollars per gallon on paint," says Martin, "are missing the point." ■

REX

A New E-Commerce Website, Produced by Restore Media, LLC

REX is a new e-commerce website that will go LIVE in early 2012. It serves the 500,000 building and design professionals and enthusiasts who are already researching building materials and services online via Restore Media's eight websites.

REX will make it easy for these "shoppers" to become BUYERS by providing them with a comprehensive look at the suppliers' product lines. REX will allow buyers to search, compare, price and purchase online. REX will feature products, product catalogs, product specifications and product videos–all in an easy-to-navigate, searchable format.

According to research conducted among several thousand building and design professionals in February, 2011, 75% of these industry professionals and their clients already purchase building materials on the internet. These buyers cite "availability," "ability to compare," and "convenience" as their reasons for purchasing via the internet. Some buy direct from the manufacturer, but many buy through dealers and wholesalers. Price is very important to these buyers, but so is "dealing direct" even when discounts are not offered.

Also, according to Restore Media research, only 53% of suppliers SELL online. There is a gap between those who want to BUY online and those who have the ability to SELL online. REX will help close this gap by providing suppliers with a new e-commerce web site to sell a new market of worldwide web BUYERS.

REX delivers a new marketplace. By virtue of the REX connection to Restore Media, REX will be a trusted source for building material sourcing and buying. Restore Media's publications, websites, e-newsletters, web seminars, conferences blogs and social media will all direct industry trade professionals and enthusiasts to REX. REX does not preclude suppliers from conducting business elsewhere, including from their own websites, but REX has the advantage of leveraging Restore Media's existing buyer database and the integrated media outreach to attract these buyers.

Special Sponsor's Presentation

Higher Education: How Marvin Windows and Doors Brought New Light to an Old School

On-demand version available

The K-12 school building in Richfield Springs, N.Y., a lovely piece of historic architecture, needed work on its windows, which were aging badly and in dire need of attention. Though the option was considered, restoration wasn't a realistic answer; nearly all the windows had deteriorated too badly. Instead, the school district asked Marvin Windows and Doors to help specify replacements that would match the school's traditional design, while also bringing to bear the advantages of 21st-century window technology. The story of how Marvin did it is an object lesson in schooling a willing but inexperienced client in the myriad details of a complicated restoration project.

Presenters: Tony Bartorillo, CSI, CCPR, Marvin Windows and Doors of New York, Cortland, N.Y.
David Blackwell, project manager, Lend Lease Project Management and Construction, Syracuse, N.Y.
William (Bill) T. Connor, vice president, Lend Lease Project Management and Construction, Syracuse, N.Y.
Robert Barraco, superintendent of schools, Richfield Springs CSD, Richfield Springs, N.Y.

Moderator: Judy L. Hayward, education director, Traditional Building Exhibition and Conference and Traditional Building Conference Series, Restore Media, LLC, Washington, D.C.

Differences of Opinion: How Do You Balance 'Compatibility' and 'Differentiation' When You're Adding On to an Historic Structure?

On-demand version available 90 minutes, 1.5 HSW LU

Learning Objectives After the session, participants will be able to do the following:

- Apply the concept of "compatible yet differentiated" to work that needs to comply with the Secretary of the Interior's Standard No. 9.
- Break down the Secretary of the Interior's Standard No. 9 for clients, explaining options and requirements to them.
- Compare and contrast additions that replicate or are differentiated from a building's historic core.
- Select materials more appropriately on the way to designing more effective additions.

Presenters: Robert D. Loversidge, Jr., FAIA, president, CEO, Schooley Caldwell Associates, Columbus, Ohio
John Sandor, architectural historian, Technical Preservation Services, National Park Service, Washington, D.C.
Cynthia Roubik, AIA, LEED AP, Architect III, Commission on Chicago Landmarks, Chicago

Hidden Treasures

Salvage Secrets: Transforming Reclaimed Materials into Design Concepts

by Joanne Palmisano, photographs by Susan Teare

W. W. Norton & Company, Inc., New York, NY; 2011

256 pages; hardcover; approximately 150 color photographs; $39.95

ISBN 978-0-393-73339-6

Reviewed by Annabel Hsin

It was like detective work when veteran salvager and interior designer Joanne Palmisano went in search of vintage salvaged wood for her kitchen island. The pieces needed to be long – 6 ft. and 11 ft., respectively – and about 3-in. thick, and with these specifications in hand, she contacted her local architectural salvage shop, which directed her to a farmer who collected reclaimed wood. After about an hour's drive, Palmisano and her family found themselves in the middle of a field, knee-deep in snow, uncovering a single board from a pile of floor joists from a 1880s railroad building. After the farmer sanded away the dirt and grime, a perfect piece of reddish-colored, fine-grained wood was revealed. It now graces the countertop of her kitchen's L-shaped island.

Oftentimes, homeowners shy away from using salvaged material for renovation projects because they are perceived as expensive or stylistically limited. In her new book, Salvage Secrets: Transforming Reclaimed Materials into Design Concepts, Palmisano challenges this idea, arguing that salvage materials not only have a good story behind them, but that they can also complement a broad range of design styles. Through more than 150 color photographs and line drawings, she demonstrates that "Modern, sleek, clean, simple, stylish, beautiful and chic are just a few of the words now used to describe home designs that incorporate salvage materials."

The introduction is set up as a guide to help readers venture out on their first salvage hunt. Terms are defined, as they are often used interchangeably, and statistics and facts reveal the waste created by the construction industry: according to a study conducted by the National Association of Home Builders, 8,000 pounds of waste is created for every 2,000-sq.ft. home built.

Palmisano addresses the issue of cost by explaining that while salvaged material is often less expensive than buying new products, the labor costs associated with preparation and installation can be higher. However, salvaged pieces often add enough character to a room that the accompanying details can be modest. She stresses that careful planning is the key to lowering labor costs. Letting the builder know in advance which salvaged items are being used will prevent reinstallation, as older pieces usually don't conform to today's standard measurements.

The first five chapters are dedicated to the different salvageable materials: wood, glass, metal, stone, concrete, brick and ceramics, and lighting. Each chapter consists of sections focused on the different varieties within the material category, its possible uses, challenges of the material and its finishes, sealing and installation requirements. The text thoroughly examines each material and breaks down the questions to consider during every stage of the project. The last two chapters contain information on where to locate salvaged material and a portfolio of how these items can be incorporated in the home. The resource section provides contact information for architects, designers, builders and architectural shops and centers specializing in salvaged materials consulted for the book, as well as others located across the country.

Perhaps the most useful aspect of this book – whether for architects, design professionals or homeowners – is the photography with detailed captions. Design examples range from Modern to traditional. Ideas are innovative, such as a salvaged glass block as a shower partition in a bathroom; a copper candy bowl converted into a second sink for a farmhouse; and aluminum siding made from leftover scrap metal bent to create a shingle exterior. In another example, an architect and homeowner arranged leftover pieces of wood – plywood, trim, even cedar shingles – in a jigsaw puzzle-like design to create a feature wall in the master bedroom. The portfolio chapter contains an image depicting end-cuts of timber from an old dam used as flooring tile, each piece featuring its own growth rings and color.

This kitchen addition features cabinets with original pulls from a college chemistry lab and a soapstone sink that came from a neighbor's home. Salvaged trim board was used as window trim and barn boards were installed on the floors. An antique cabinet now serves as a spice cupboard.

Salvage Secrets is more than a coffee table book – it is a practical guide filled with useful information about the different salvageable materials available and points readers in the right direction to start their own search for those unique pieces that will complete their designs. As Palmisano notes in the conclusion, "A beautifully designed, finished room isn't the only reward in working with salvaged material – the initial inspiration, the hunt, the selection, and the anticipation you feel as you watch the room come together are all a part of the fun. And, of course, knowing that your eco-friendly process is contributing to the greater good of the world makes it just that much better." ■

Palmisano addresses the issue of cost by explaining that while salvaged material is often less expensive than buying new products, the labor costs associated with preparation and installation can be higher. However, salvaged pieces often add enough character to a room that the accompanying details can be modest.

While New Jersey is not generally well known for its built environment, the state is home to a number of architectural icons, such as The George Washington Bridge and Ellis Island. To commemorate the American Institute of Architects' 150th anniversary, as well as to celebrate these impressive structures, the New Jersey chapter honors the milestone with a new book featuring 150 of the best examples of architecture in the state. Over 2,000 AIA New Jersey members were asked to submit their picks. Written by Philip S. Kennedy Grant, FAIA, Mark Alan Hewitt, FAIA, and Michael J. Mills, FAIA, with a foreword by Michael Graves, the text offers insightful and informative prose about the buildings, which range from the hallowed halls of Princeton University to early Georgian manses and a 1940s diner.

The authors' extensive backgrounds in New Jersey architecture and preservation allow their prose to be descriptive, precise and eloquent. Grant, an architect, artist and writer, has written extensively on the subject of architecture. And from 1984 to 1993 he was the chairman of the editorial board of Architecture New Jersey magazine. Hewitt, an architect, preservationist and architectural historian, has taught architecture at both Rice and Columbia universities and has written several books on design. He currently sits on the faculty of the art history department at Rutgers University and runs his own practice. Mills is a principal at Mills + Schnoering Architects of Princeton and is past president of Preservation New Jersey.

The book is an ideal desk reference for all of the state's architectural hot spots. It is divided into the five regions: the Gateway, the Shore, greater Atlantic City and Southern Shore, and the Skylands regions, showcasing the buildings for their cultural, historical and architectural significance. Architectural giants featured include Frank Lloyd Wright, Ralph Adams Cram, Walter Cope and John Stewardson. Many of the structures featured are designated as National Historic Landmarks and museums. All are beautifully presented, with photographs by Alexander M. Noble.

During the Colonial era, New Jersey's buildings were influenced by both British and Dutch building types. Some of the oldest examples of extant buildings are the Dey Mansion in Wayne, a Georgian Manor house built by Dirck Dey – a Dutch-born planter – and finished by his son Theunis. The brick house with brownstone coursing and a gambrel roof reflects both Dutch and English influences and is quite rare for the area, the authors note. Another early influence of the Dutch style is found in the Steuben House in River Edge, which is one-and-a-half stories and made of brownstone ashlars and topped with a gambrel roof with a "swept profile." Today it is owned by the state and is the museum headquarters for the Bergen County Historical Society.

One of the finest and most notable Georgian houses in the state is Morristown's Ford Mansion, which was the military headquarters for George Washington from December 1779 to June 1780. The symmetrical structure is five bays wide and two stories tall. "It has a central Palladian entry with an arched transom over the main paneled door, with sidelights between applied pilasters," write the authors. Today the building operates as an historical museum operated by the National Park Service.

New Jersey has been known as an industrial powerhouse since the inception of America's Industrial Revolution. The RCA Victor Building in Camden is one of New Jersey's most important and recognizable industrial landmarks. Built on the waterfront in 1909 for the manufacturing of phonographs and other electrical equipment, the main design feature of the structure is an elaborate brick tower that extends five stories high.

The Rogers Locomotive Works in Paterson was an American industrial giant when the first buildings were erected in 1831, and later machine shops were built in 1854. Today the remaining brick structures are part of the S.U.M. Great Falls National Historic Landmark District.

The Queen Anne-style Glenmont in West Orange was completed in 1882 and purchased by Thomas Edison in 1886.

The Stuart Richardson House in Glen Ridge, an example of Frank Lloyd Wright's Usonian houses, was designed in 1941 and built in 1951.

Gustav Stickley lived in Parsippany from 1910 to 1914, creating what would be known as Craftsman Farms, where he would live and work, designing furniture. Today Craftsman Farms is designated as a National Historic Landmark and museum displaying a large collection of original Stickley furniture. Thomas Edison lived in West Orange in a Queen Anne house known as Glenmont, which was designed by Henry Hudson Holly, the largest seller of house plans in the country. The home is located in Llewellyn Park, which is believed to be the country's first planned residential community. (West Orange is also home to the Edison Factory and Museum, run by the National Park Service.) The Stuart Richardson House in Glen Ridge is one of Wright's Usonian designs. "These houses were built without basements, attics, and garages and with flat roofs, small kitchens and bedrooms, and extensive expanses of glass doors to permit access to the outside," write the authors.

One of New Jersey's most whimsical structures is Lucy the Elephant in Margate. Made of metal in 1881 and patented by James V. Lafferty, it was to be an eye catcher to sell real estate in the area. Also featured is the Caribbean Motel in Wildwood, which has been preserved by the efforts of the Doo Wop Preservation League. ■
